HE HAD $25,000 HID IN HIS HUT ON HEMPSTEAD PLAIN.

Now That He's Gone, the Money He Saved so industriously Goes to a Real Bank Gold of France and Spain and Odd silver Pieces of Sixty Years Ago.

They were counting Uncle Billy Jaynes's hoard yesterday over in the First National Rank of Hempstead, dumping the shining old and the dull silver and the dirty greensales upon a big square table and counting me money with a swift exactness that would have pained Uncle Billy himself. The old man liked to finger his money slowly, building up tall heaps of coin and withing tattered slips of curency between he fingers as he sat all alone in his tumblewe old cabin on the Hempstead plain.

It was a queer store that Uncle Billy had got together in his eighty-nine years on arth: money that he had slaved and toiled dickered for and bargained for. If could have thrown a diamond necklace wo, a communion cup of fine gold maybe, and half a dozen jewelled rings upon the gaped up gold and silver and paper it would not have required much imagination believe that the contents of a pirate's thest had found their way into a dull and presaic twentieth century bank. Ceronly there was a variety of moneys that he old man had put piece by piece and bill by bill into the only kind of bank he beheved in a grain sack carefully hidden. Double eagles and eagles and five dollar gold pieces from Uncle Sam's stamp mills were mixed with louis of France and French five franc pieces of gold, with here and there a Spanish piece. There were nearly two hundred tiny gold dollars, some of which Uncle Billy had treasured for very many years, and $2.50 gold pieces and three dollar coins of gold.1

The silver coins were an odd lot, most of them American, but there were enough old Mexican dollars and of the metal curyeary of South American republics, coins which Uncle Billy had picked up goodness knows where, to puzzle the experienced bank clerks.

Some of these coins were sixty years old the old man had allowed himself no vacahave given extreme pleasure to Uncle her first and was still alive.

the stone hearth of the old fashioned fireplace. He had no use for the banks of commerce, had Uncle Billy. One time he said to Charley Bailey, about his only close

"When you make a dollar, keep her. Never stick her in a bank. If you give her to somebody else you ain't got her."

Where Uncle Billy came from when he settled down on a seven acre farm on the Hempstead Plain in the cabin which stands half a mile from the Cherry Valley roadavery tired and bent old house it was when Uncle Billy moved in—nobody ever knew for certain. He never talked much about himself, continually afraid that somehody would believe he had taken a second wife on August 15, 1904, while living in Daytona and after her death on September 21, 1905, had been married body would believe he had money and would try to rob him of it.

They used to say years ago in the neighborhood that Uncle Billy had a love affair when he was very young, and that when the girl jilted him he ceased to care for anything in the world but money. That was not strictly true, because Uncle Billy liked children and the only money he ever gave away, so far as anybody knows, he growl which Uncle Billy tried to make very fierce and scary, but which never imposed upon the children. -Children began to call him Uncle Biffy years ago and everybody took up the name in time.

For forty years he worked his patch of ground, raising strawberries and green truck, with a little hav and corn; trading in odds and ends; keen as a razor at scenting a bargain and squeezing all the juice out of it. He never married and he hated to talk about women. Uncle Billy was his own cook and housekeeper, and pretty much his own tailor. He could handle a taste in garments was hardly artistic. Just a pair of baggy brown pants, a rough coat, a wool shirt, cap and whatever trimmings were eneded; they were quite enough for

"What d'ye think I am? A lady killer! Huh!" the old man snorted one day when tharley Bailey hinted delicately that he ought to get a new suit of clothes. "This here suit has done me four year, Charley," he said complacently. "I dunno but what she's good for another four."

Everybody for miles around thought ncle Billy had money and plenty of it, hough nobody guessed the amount. Charley Bailey and Judge Seabury used to worry about what might happen to the old man in case the yeggmen should hear the stories which were floating around. They were afraid they might hear any morning that Incle Billy had been murdered. One night they went to the cabin and talked arnestly to him about the danger he was

"Come in," said Uncle Billy, gruffly He pulled out a drawer in a dilapidated old bureau and laid two horse pistols-probably they hadn't been fired for quarter of a century—on the table. Then be yanked a short barrelled shotgun from under the bed.
"See them?" he demanded. "Well, reckon I can take care of myself. Jest let any criminal come pokin' around here and I'll blow his derned head off. That I will!" here was no use talking to him about it. He was hot tempered on the subject and apt to grow a bit crabbed suddenly. But Charley Bailey found out that Uncle Billy haver sat in the light of the big open fireplace counting his gold and silver without the pistols between his legs and the shotgun in easy reach. He was plucky, was Uncle billy, and primed for a fight most any time.

One night last October Charley Bailey was driving along the Cherry Valley road when he saw the old man staggering drunkenly across the ploughed fields. Bailey jumped from his buggy and caught Uncle Billy around the waist

ly around the waist "I'm purty sick, Charley," said Uncle silly Jaynes. "Recken I'm goin' to-night. I had to hev you, though. Take me home." Bailey took him to the cabin, carried him in and laid him on the bed. Then he went to Hempstead after Judge Seabury and Dr. Henry M. Warner, the judge to draw. Dr. Henry M. Warner, the judge to draw up a will, the doctor to do whatever possible. As for a preacher it was not to be thought of. Uncle Billy would have repelled such a suggestion scornfully. The old fellow was pretty well gone when they got back and he had made up his mind he didn't want any will

"Ain't goin' to have no rowin' about my money," he said weakly. "Ain't got enough br. Warner wanted to give him some medicine to strengthen his heart, but he wouldn't have it at all.

*Ain't never took no drugs. Ain't goin' te now, "said Uncle Billy and that ended it. The Judge and the doctor went away. ing toward the middle of the night Uncle

Billy turned to Charley Bailey.

"I got to go out to the barn, Charley,"
he gasped. "You got to go with me."
"Why, it would kill you, Uncle Billy,"

UNCLE BILLY JAYNES'S HOARD | Bailey objected. "Wait till to-morrow | FINAL PLEAS FOR HART M'KEE

"There ain't goin' to be no to-morrow," said the old man decisively "If you won't go with me I'll crawl out alone."
Bailey carried him in the pitch dark and laid him down by the haymow. Uncle Billy fumbled under the loose hay and drew out a big grain sack. Bailey carried Uncle Billy fumbled under the loose hay and drew out a big grain sack. Bailey carried Unole Billy and the grain sack back to the house.

"Just see that no criminals gets a hold of this," said the old man. "There's nigh on to $14,000 in this sack, Charley."

He died the next day and was buried presently, but he left the puzzle of his wealth behind him. Bailey knew he had more than the bank notes and greepbacks which

than the bank notes and greenbacks which were hidden in the grain sack under the haymow, but some queer crick in Uncle Billy's brain prevented him from telling where the rest of his hoard was concealed. For months they ransacked the cabin, Charley Bailey and Sylvanus De Mott, the charley Bailey and Sylvanus De Mott, the administrators appointed by the court, but they couldn't find a cent. As it turned out afterward, they had their hands many a time within three inches of $11,000 which Uncle Billy had hidden.

This week they decided to tear the old house down and they went about it systematically exemplains every board sorretematically, examining every board, scru-tinizing every stick and stone. They worked back to the shed extension finally and were ripping the rotten lath and plaster apart when something heavy fell with a thud among the débris. One look was enough to tell them they had come across Uncle Billy's gold.

It was a neat trick in hiding the old man had planned out. First he had taken a narrow stick of wood about eighteen inches long. Into that he had driven five nails. From every nail he hung a bag of gold. Then he had poked the whole business into distress stores had a trivial his hand. a disused stovepipe hole until his hand found the space between the lath and plaster of a double wall. It was easy enough to drop the queer rig of stick and string and bags of gold into this dark hole and then severe the stick on a hook which prethen secure the stick on a hook which previously he had driven into place with much trouble and care. That was why Bailey's hand poking into the old stovepipe hole had found nothing.

There are plenty of claimants for the old man's money, a dozen or more cousins more or less removed, and the problem of distributing Uncle Billy's wealth is now being worked out by Surrogate Jackson and the administrators.

> BORROWED FROM DETECTIVE. Central Office Man Explains How Tom

O'Connor Came to Pay Him Money. In yesterday's trial of Thomas O'Connor and Frances McClain before Judge Holt in the United States Circuit Court Central Office Detectives Nelson and McConville were called to the witness stand by the Government. Hugh Gordon Miller, the defendants' counsel, had promised some sensational developments concerning police protection given to bucket shop and similar enterprises.

"When did you first see O'Connor?" Mr. Miller asked Nelson, who took the stand "A year ago in this city," was the reply.

"What was the occasion?" "When I arrested him on a fugitive war-rant from Chicago which Gov. Hughes refused to recognize."
"Did you receive a money order from Connor for $20 and sign the receipt?

"I have done so on several occasions."

"Didn't you agree, if he [O'Connor] would fix you to get his photograph out of the rogues' gallery and square him with the Federal authorities?" "Wasn't $500 taken from O'Connor at Police Headquarters and restored to him at the police station?" This question referred to O'Connor's recent arrest.

"Yes," was Nelson's reply.
"Didn't you say to O'Conno" that it was about time you got your share of it?"
"No." Mr. Miller declined to ask Detective McConville any questions, but both McConville and Nelson have been subpoenaed by Mr. Miller as adverse wit-nesses. It is expected that the defence will open its case to-day, when further questioning of the detectives will follow.

REVEALED WIFE'S LETTERS TO REBUT FOUL CHARGES.

Maitre Labori Reads Letter From Col. Baxter Assailing Him-Wife's Father's Lawyer Argues Chiedy Against Damages for Libel-Proofs of Affection.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN. Paris, April 15 .- Mattre Labori, counsel for Hart A. McKee in Mrs. McKee's divorce suit, resumed his argument to-day before an evidently bored tribunal. He began by saying that his opponents had utterly failed in their attempt to prove the grave charges they had made against his client.

He said the originals of Miss Lawlor's letters to Alliotti had been stolen from McKee's rooms in his Paris hotel, but copies had been supplied two months ago, giving plenty of time for consultation with Miss Lawlor with regard to them, although she was in the United States.

Mattre Labori spoke for three hours more without bringing out any new facts. Much time was devoted to indignant denial of the charges against his client. He cited a letter from Mrs. McKee's sister congratulating her on her happiness and also one from the Duke de Cazes and the Duke de Blest, who had acted as McKee's seconds in a dispute with Jacques de Bris, who had been rude to Mrs. McKee at a ball. So McKee instead of ill treating his wife had been a champion lover.

Labori called in question the allegations about Mrs. McKee's ill health. He said that when she left Varennes she automobiled 130 miles in a day. One day she removed her effects from the house. Four days later she requested her husband to join her. A few days later she appeared before an examining Magistrate.

Labori defended Baron Alliotti against the charges of supplying doubtful copies of Miss Lawlor's letters, pointing out that Alliotti was a man of standing and had been Chargé d'Affaires at Paris since the death of Ambassador Tornielli

The originals of the Lawlor letters, Lapori went on to say, were stolen from McKee's room, it was believed, though there was no proof of the fact, by a servant 57 years old, who had charged McKee with infamous conduct toward her. She alone had access to the room. Copies of the letters had been supplied two months ago, not recently, as Maitre Barboux had alleged.

Labori produced the household expense book of the McKees as proof that McKee kept house lavishly. The food alone for ten months cost $3,800. He reiterated that McKee advanced his wife $16,000 to pay her gambling losses. He said he had applied thrice vainly for the production of the original trust deed of Mrs. McKee's fortune and twice for a copy of her will that she made in April, 1906. A codicil to this will stated that in case of her death McKee should have charge of her son, Hugh Tevis. Maitre Labori denied the charges that McKee had falsified the accounts of Hugh Tevis. M. Labori then took the original of the code employed by McKee and his wife up to the Judges and they examined several of Mrs. McKee's letters. M. Labori argued that the letters could only be translated by using unprintable meanings of the code words, but this discussion was in whispers and was not allowed to reach the audience.

M. Barboux had complained, M. Labori said, of the publicity given to Mrs. McKee's letters, but McKee had been driven to use them in self-defence when he was charged with beastliness, obscenity and cupidity, in order to show the character of the woman who attacked him.

M. Labori read a letter that Col. Baxter, Mrs. McKee's father, had written to several Patsburg people describing McKee as a degenerate and asking them to give him information about McKee and his family. He added that his daughter was seeking a French divorce because she would thus avoid raking up past scandals, which would be made public if the case were tried in America.

In concluding M. Labori dealt with the defamation charge, saying that McKee had never given a newspaper an interview. Those alleged to be with him, which were read at the last hearing, were based on information supplied by Mrs. McKee's side of the case and from legal documents connected with the suit M. Labori argued that Col. Baxter and Mrs. McKee were liable for what appeared in the American newspapers, as these papers were publicly sold in Paris.

M. Dorville, who appeared on behalf of Col. Baxter, argued that if libels had been published the offence was committed in America. There was no specific evidence that papers containing the articles in question had been sold in Paris. M. Dorville read extracts from McKee's newspaper con-*tributions signed "Fifi" and also descriptions of satanic practices in the black mass as specimens of the writer's taste in literature. He said sarcastically that perhaps McKee was better employed when he was occupied with the servants than when writing such stuff.

FIGHT WITH MINDANAO BANDITS. No Americans Hurt, but Several of the Outlaws Killed.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN. MANILA, April 15.-Reports have been received from the island of Mindanao telling of the depredations of a band of Moro outlaws. Cable communication between Zamboanga, the capital of Mindanao, and Manila is interrupted, but despatches from nearby stations indicate that an expedition composed of troops and constabulary has had an encounter with the band at Lake Ianao. There were no casualties on the American side. The Moros are reported to have lost their leader and several others killed, wounded or captured. The trouble originated with the outlaws, who have carried on a persistent campaign of murder and robbery for the last six months. All attempts hitherto to arrest the leaders have proved ineffectual. The outlaws receive no sympathy from the population of the island and no help, excepting such as may be extorted by force of arms. The Government is undisturbed.

IRISH OPPOSE CHURCHILL.

Want to Hasten Dissolution of Parliament Manchester's Hottest Fight.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN. LONDON, April 15.- From twenty to thirty political meetings daily, an incessant house to house canvassing, a constant issue of innumerable printed appeals to various interests and a general disruption of normal conditions of life are the features of the parliamentary contest now going on in the northwest division of Manchester to fill the vacancy in the House of Commons caused by the appointment of Winston Churchill to a Cabinet position. It is one of the hottest electoral fights that has ever occurred in this country. Mr. Churchill was keenly alive to the strength of the free trade idea in Manchester, and he is playing this card to the utmost, while Mr. Joynson-Hicks, his Conservative opponent, for the same reason, is giving prominence to every issue but free trade

There is nothing yet clearly indicating marked advantage on either side, but the Conservatives had a disappointing shock to-day when the free traders in their party announced their determination to support Mr. Churchill.

There are many Conservatives in Great Britain who are opposed to the idea of a tariff as strongly as are the Liberals, and those in Manchester regard fiscal reform as a heresy, justifying the sacrifice of other party principles in order to secure its defeat.

On the other hand, Mr. Churchill will get no help from the Irish voters. John Redmond, the Nationalist leader, in a speech at Dublin reviewed the Government's attitude on Home Rule, and advised Irishmen in Manchester not to support the Liberal candidate. It was not, he said any question of Mr. Churchill's personality, but the question of the new Government's attitude toward Irish aspirations. It was to Ireland's interest to hasten the dissolution of the present Parliament. Meanwhile both Mr. Churchill and Mr. Joynson-Hicks are anxious concerning the extent to which they will suffer from the interposition of Mr. Irving, the Socialist candidate. Socialism is fairly strong in the constituency, and Mr. Irving is a strong candidate. Mr. Joynson-Hicks apparently stands to lose most from Socialist attack, as Mr. Irving, like himself, favors tariff reform. If no Socialist candidate had appeared many of the Socialists would have probably supported Mr. Joynson-Hicks. A. G. Hales, the independent candidate, has

in the Race for President. Special Cable Despatch to TRE SUS. PANAMA, April 15 .- A convention composed of five delegates representing the provisional conservative section of the Constitutional party nominated Ricardo Arias to-day as a candidate for the Presidency. Two other delegates, Señores Lambert and Calvo, retired from the convention, they representing another section of the government party, which had previously nominated Domingo Obaldia, formerly Minister at Washington. The government Liberals were not represented, although the Constitutional party was based originally on the equal representation of its former political elements.

The Liberals and Conservatives of all the provinces were directly represented in the convention by their own members, except Panama, whose delegate hailed from Los Santos Province. Señor Arias is apparently the official candidate, but it is feared the struggle will continue, the Obaldistas refusng to recognize Arias's nomination, the Government party being practically split internally.

The general elections will be held on July 5 and the new President will be inaugurated on October 1. The Assembly will meet on September 1.

ing of the Maine, the Post says: "On another page we reproduce from THE SUN an editorial giving an account of the movement afoot for raising the Maine and for the decent burial of the bones of the American sailors lying in the filthy mud of the harbor. The indifference with which our Government has treated the wreck has been a burning shame and we are sincerely glad that there is a prospect of ending it. "As THE SUN points out, there is no international difficulty to overcome while an American government is in charge of Cuba, and Gov. Magoon is known to highly favor the removal of the wreck not only from motives of decency but because the hulk is ruining the harbor by causing a shoal. Therefore we are sanguine of a realization of the hope, which we expressed in February, that before the anniversary of the destruction of the battleship rolls round again the Maine will have been

A GIRL'S DARING ESCAPE. Alma Stranahan Crawls to Safety Along Call for Reforms. Gutter of Burning House.

EAST ORANGE, N. J., April 15 .- Frank N. Stranahan set fire by accident last night to some curtains in the third story of his home at 14 Hawthorne place. Before he realized the extent of the fire and could arouse the other members of the family it was roaring through the upper part of the house and was making its way down stairs.

He called out to awaken the family and then sought to stamp the fire out, but he was driven downstairs and in a few minutes the woodwork on the second floor was blazing. The shouts awakened his young daughter Alma, who opened her door to find that she was cut off by the fire. She shut the door and waited, but the flames made short work of the door and the smoke began to fill the room.

Opening her window she found that there was a narrow gutter over which she might crawl a distance of thirty feet to a point where she could drop to a porch roof. While neighbors who had been aroused watched her the girl crawled along the gutter, took the drop to the roof and landed with slight bruises. Neighbors got a ladder and took her down.

The escape of Mrs. Stranahan, who is an invalid, was almost as thrilling. She was carried out onto the porch roof through another window and thence to the ground. another window and thence to the ground.

The firemen checked the fire after about an hour's work. Elmer Burnham, a neighbor, was scalded while trying to put the fire out before the arrival of the firemen. BROOKLYN "POLY" IN STRAITS. It Now Owes About $400,000-Alumni

The board of managers of the alumni association of the Polytechnic Institute in Brooklyn has issued a circular setting forth the unsatisfactory financial condition of the institute and criticising its present administration. Prior to 1899, according to the circular, when Henry Sanger Snow, the defaulting and fugitive treasurer of the New York and New Jersey Telephone Company, beand New Jersey Telephone Company, became president, the Polytechnic was practically a paying institution. Under Mr. Snow's administration financial difficulties speedily ensued and when he retired in 1904 the deficit amounted to $132,972.80. Under Dr. Atkinson, his successor, the deficits continued, and in his four years administration they have footed up $186,- 016.34. The circular says: Thus a loss of $268,989.14 has been made tions cannot longer be continued under the present system of financing Mr. Snow met these deficits by increasing the mortgages fon the lands and buildings of the Polytechnic. Since that time deficits have been met by loans until the borrowing capacity of the property has been reached and by voluntary contributions by individual members of the corporation. The present indebtedness of the Polytechnic is substantially as follows: Mortgages on buildings, $230,000; loans, &c., $170,000; total, $400,000.

During the last few months bank loans to substantial amounts have been called and great difficulty has been experienced in financing them. The Polytechnic owns no real estate other than that occupied by its present buildings. It has no endowment worthy of mention. The managers of the alumni association deplore the abandonment of the liberal course and call for a correction of the present evils and a revival of the standards of earlier years. A meeting is to be held at the institute this evening to consider the matters brought forward in the circular.

Inexplained Explosion in a Tenement. An explosion yesterday in a five story tenement occupied by Italians at 408 East Sixty-third street wrecked two rooms but injured no one. The police were unable to learn whether a bomb had gone off or a piece of dynamite ; aken from excavation work. Four Italians were arrested on
